Maximilian had a brother and a sister:

The brother worked in his father's bakery; he was also a baker. He was the only one who survived the Holocaust; all the others were deported to concentration camps and killed.

My husband's sister owned two houses and a beautiful store. She often invited us to lunch on the holidays. In 1938 she got baptized, along with a friend of hers, also a rich woman. My sister-in-law only had one son, Stefan – Pista was the short Hungarian version of his name.

Alfred's siblings were: Moritz, Franziska, Samuel, Josef, Cilly and Hedi.

Moritz Rosenstein, whom they called Mur, was a chemist and partner of an oil refinery in Vienna. He was on a business trip in London at the time of the Anschluss and remained there. He never returned to Vienna, and died in the 1950s. His daughter, Hanni, lives in Tel Aviv and has two grown-up daughters; his son fell in World War II.

Franziska Wessely, nee Rosenstein, fled from Vienna to Yugoslavia. She lived with false papers in Slovenia and committed suicide when the Ustasha knocked on her door. They, however, only wanted to ask the way to some place they were headed.

Samuel Rosenstein fled to Holland with his wife and two children. He and his family were killed by the Nazis.

Josef Rosenstein was an insurance salesman. He also fled to Yugoslavia, where he was killed by the Ustasha.

Cilly managed to immigrate to Australia via England. She died in 1962. Her daughter, Fairlie Nassau, who was born in 1945, lives in Melbourne and has two grown-up children.

Hedi Pahmer (nee Rosenstein) married a Hungarian and moved to Budapest with him. She was deported to Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where she survived the war. Afterward she also immigrated to Australia.
