

On The Sidewalk In Bratislava

This photo was taken in April 1938, in Bratislava. It shows my father, Julius, my little brother, Siegfried, and me, Henrich, on the sidewalk in Bratislava, in front of the Slovak National Theater. In the background you can see cars that belonged to a taxi service.

My father was born in Topolníky, at the time Nyarasd, on 25th November 1900. He finished mercantile school in Dunajská Streda, and then got a job in Bratislava. If I was to describe my father, I'd say he was a fantastic person. A truly good man. He was purposeful, of sound character, and punctual. He always managed to achieve what he wanted. There were never any disagreements between us. He was so tall, that he towered over everyone around him. He was around two meters tall.

As little children, we ran around the town and, during our wanderings, we would always run in to see one of our relatives. I might have been about 10 years old at the time. I remember that we used to go see Aunt Juliska and watch hats being made. Pieces of felt cloth would be stretched over forms, making various styles. Aunt Juliska survived the war, and moved away to Israel. We'd always run in to see another of Grandma's sisters, Regina. Eventually, she lived right across from Grandma. Regina was deported during the war, and probably died in a concentration camp. At Bernat's we'd wander around the stonemasonry and watch him carve letters. Mozes was also a stonemason, and because he lived across from us, we also visited him often. We'd amuse ourselves by painting ourselves with gold paint that he used to paint the letters on tombstones. Bernat and Mozes were deported and died in a concentration camp. During the war we visited Illes, who lived in Nitra. My brother, grandmother and I hid out in the courtyard that was next door to his furniture factory. Illes was also deported. After the war, Jakub returned and emigrated to Australia.

So that's the entire family tree on my grandmother's side.
